

Cluck, cluck! Get ready to meet one of the most common and interesting animals - the chicken! Chickens are feathered animals often found in different colors like white, brown, and black. They have a small head, a pointed beak, a pair of wings and their body is covered with soft feathers. You can easily distinguish them with their red comb on the head and two long legs ending with sharp claws.

Carrying on from their unique look, let's talk about where these fascinating creatures live. Chickens are usually raised in a coop or a cage in farms or sometimes in our backyards. They love to roam around during the day, pecking at the ground in search of food. At night, they sleep in their nests that are often built in high places to stay safe from predators.

Speaking of food, chickens aren't picky eaters! They eat grains, seeds, small insects and even green vegetables. Chickens also have a life cycle similar to other birds: from an egg, they grow into a chick, then into a chicken. And did you know? A mama chicken is called a hen, and she can lay over 300 eggs in a year!

Now, isn't that egg-citing? Chickens have been buddies with humans for a long time. We keep chickens for their eggs, their meat, and sometimes just for their friendly company. In the wild, they need to watch out for other animals like foxes and hawks, but they have strong wings to fly short distances for their safety. And remember, even though chickens might look similar to turkeys or ducks, they're a totally different species with their own unique behaviors and characteristics.
